SEPTEMBER 2015

Julia Margaret Cameron

An exhibition of 100 photographic portraits by Julia Margaret Cameron, on loan from the Victoria and Albert Museum, London, is being held at the Art Gallery NSW, Sydney.

Cameron's career as a photographer began in 1863, at the age of 48, when her daughter gave her a camera as a present. Within a year she had mastered the complex chemistry of wet-plate photography and was to become a pioneer of photographic portraiture and one of the most influential and innovative photographers of the 19th century.

Cameron strove to capture beauty and introduced an emotive sensibility to early photographic portraiture. She was obsessive with what she saw as her art. Her subjects, neighbours and members of her social circle including Alfred Lord Tennyson, Charles Darwin, John Herschel, Robert Browning, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and many other notable figures of the time, would sit for countless exposures as she laboriously coated, exposed, and processed each wet plate. The results were closely-framed, soft-focus, pensive portraits created through long exposures and leaving the lens intentionally out of focus. Her unconventional techniques attracted criticism and ridicule from some of her more orthodox contemporaries, but praise from others for her daring originality.

Captive-Bred Regent Honeyeater Release

Recently, several WACC members attended an open day at Chiltern-Mt Pilot National Park where they learnt about the Captive-Bred Regent Honeyeater Release Project, witnessed the release of a Regent Honeyeater and visited spots where other Regent Honeyeaters were feeding and courting.

Neville Bartlett, WACC member and Project volunteer explains: "Regent Honeyeaters are an endangered species that number less than 500 birds.

They can be found are in the Capertee Valley in NSW and Chiltern-Mt Pilot National Park in Victoria. These lovely birds are struggling to survive the rigours of living in the wild and a captive release program is running to see if more can be learnt about helping this species survive.

Birds are bred at Taronga Zoo, transferred to Chiltern and released into the wild in April / May when eucalypt flowering is underway. Some of the birds are fitted with radio transmitters each with its own frequency so that individual birds can be tracked. The batteries in the transmitters last 10-12 weeks and the harness designed to break off so the birds are not encumbered indefinitely by having a transmitter fitted. The birds do not seem to suffer any ill-effects from wearing a transmitter.

All released birds are fitted with coloured leg bands to aid visual identification without having to capture or otherwise disturb the birds.

One of great challenges regarding Regent Honeyeaters is to work out where the birds go between November and April. Only sporadic sightings occur in this timeframe despite many people searching for them.

Each year, captive-bred birds from earlier releases have been recorded breeding with wild birds, so there is some hope for saving the species in the wild."
